

Internet Overload

Myspace. You've all heard about it. It's all your friends talk about. Some of them could be even classified as myspace-adicks in scientific terms. If you don't know what I'm talking about you must have been living under a rock, because recently myspace has been named the most popular website in the US. It's an online network where people can make new friends and keep in touch with old ones. Most students between 6th and 12th grade have an account. Myspace announced that they have 107 accounts as of august 9 2006. These days when you want someone's information you get their phone number, address, and myspace URL. It's just yet another example oh how the internet is becoming the center of information and communication.

These days you could pretty much avoid leaving the house completely just by using the computer. You wake up head straight to the computer to, check the weather, e-mail you friend a missed assignment, buy those shoes you've been eyeing, download some songs onto your i-pod, things all made easier by going online. Remember when you got grounded and it was no TV or phone for a week, now it's now computer for a few days.

It's make you want to question, are we becoming more advanced or are we just becoming lazy. When it's gets to a point where myspace needs to be blocked at schools because it is such a distraction is a bit extreme. It's great that man kind has come such a long way, but maybe we are a little to dependent on technology.
